

The background of the cover is a photograph of a stone archway. The arch is made of large, irregular stones. Inside the arch is a wooden door with a grid pattern. A person wearing a long blue cloak is standing in the doorway, looking out. The scene is lit with warm, golden light, suggesting a sunset or sunrise. The overall mood is mysterious and historical.

The Tigress Caged

Helen Rayson-Hill

Glass House Books
The Tigress Caged

Helen Rayson-Hill trained as an infant teacher, and taught in country Victoria, Melbourne and the UK. Later, she became a drama teacher following a long interest in the theatre.

After a family transfer to Brisbane, she was appointed Queensland Manager of the Australian Elizabethan Theatre Trust. For two years she co-ordinated National Arts Week in Brisbane, working closely with the Queensland Government's Ministry of the Arts and Brisbane City Council.

On returning to Melbourne, Helen held a position at the Victorian Arts Centre in the Membership and Fundraising and Development Department. For two years she was an adjudicator for the Victorian Drama League.

Helen has performed on the stage in Melbourne and Brisbane and on television in Neighbours on Channel 10 and Something's in the Air on the Australian ABC network.

Writing has always been an interest of Helen's and she is a member of the Writers' Circle at Melbourne's Lyceum Club. She has written plays for her drama students as well as sketches for amateur theatre. Also an artist specialising in oils, Helen has held successful exhibitions at several Victorian galleries.

Helen's short stories and memoir pieces have been published in anthologies, and she has written a children's book, Kid Detectives. The story was inspired by her grandson who wanted to know how children entertained themselves before electronic devices filled their lives.

Helen has long been interested in Medieval history, especially in the life of Eleanor of Aquitaine. After many years of research, inspired originally by the play The Lion in Winter by James Goldman, Helen was motivated to write about Eleanor's amazing life. Eleanor, the Firebrand Queen became the first in a series of historical novels about this Medieval feminist, followed by The Lion and the Tigress and now this, the third volume.

The Tigress Caged

Helen Rayson-Hill

Glass House Books
Brisbane

Glass House Books

an imprint of IP (Interactive Publications Pty Ltd)

Treetop Studio • 9 Kuhler Court

Carindale, Queensland, Australia 4152

ipoz.biz/glass-house-books/

ipoz.biz/ipstore

First published by IP in 2023

© 2023 Helen Rayson-Hill, and IP

All rights reserved. Without limiting the rights under copyright reserved above, no part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in or introduced into a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means (electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise), without the prior written permission of the copyright owner and the publisher of this book.

Printed in 12 pt Book Antiqua on 14 pt Avenir Book

ISBN 9781922830371 (PB); ISBN 9781922830388 (eBook)

A catalogue record for this book is available from the National Library of Australia for my family

Contents

Genealogy	viii
Chapter 1 The Young King	1
Chapter 2 The Truth Will Out	7
Chapter 3 Prophecy and Death	45
Chapter 4 A Blessed Relief	60
Chapter 5 Aftermath	71
Chapter 6 Conflict	82
Chapter 7 Geoffrey's Wedding	91
Chapter 8 The Death of Pendragon	96
Chapter 9 Henry Cornered	107
Chapter 10 Festering Rebellion	111
Chapter 11 Incarceration	123
Chapter 12 A Loosening of the Shackles	137
Chapter 13 A Stolen Inheritance	151
Chapter 14 Grief and a Joyous Reunion	160
Chapter 15 Matilda, Queen of Saxony	165
Chapter 16 Amaris	179
Chapter 17 The Christmas from Hell	209
Chapter 18 The End of An Era	235

Genealogy

Eleanor: 1122/23-1204 (Birthdate sometimes disputed) Queen of England, Duchess of Aquitaine and Gascony, Countess of Poitou

Mother: Aenor de Rochefoucault married William X of Aquitaine

Grandmother: Dangerousa de Rochefoucault

Grandfather: Aimery de Rochefoucault Viscount of Châtellerault

Uncle: Lord Ralph de Faye, mother's brother

Father: Duke William X of Aquitaine

Uncle: Prince Raymond of Antioch, father's youngest brother six years older than Eleanor

Grandfather: Duke William IX of Aquitaine

Grandmother: Phillipa, Countess of Toulouse, Eleanor was rightfully Countess of Toulouse by inheritance

(Dangerosa and William IX were lovers and lived openly together in the Maubergeonne Tower in the Palace of Poitiers.)

Eleanor's sister Petronilla (also known as Nilla): Countess of Vermandois, husband Raoul, Count of Vermandois

Eleanor's brother: William Aigret (Died as a baby or toddler)

Henry II (Plantagenet): King of England, Duke of Normandy, Count of Anjou 1133-1189

Mother: Empress Matilda, Dowager Duchess of Normandy (Cousin of Stephen of Blois, Stephen's son Eustace)

Father: Geoffrey Plantagenet, Duke of Normandy, Count of Anjou

Brothers: Geoffrey and William, half-brother Hamelin (Illegitimate)

Mother said to be Adelaide of Anjou

Children to Eleanor and Henry:

William, Count of Poitiers 1153-1156

Henry (Hal) the Young King 1155-1183, married Princess Margaret of France

Matilda, Queen of Saxony 1156-1189, married King Henry, the Lion of Saxony

Richard I (the Lion Heart) King of England 1157-1199, married Berengaria of Navarre

Geoffrey, Duke of Brittany 1158-1186, married Constance of Brittany

Phillip (Date of birth not recorded. Probably died shortly after birth)

Eleanor (Lenore) 1161-1214 Queen of Castile, married King Alphonso of Castile

Joanna 1165-1199 Queen of Sicily, married King William of Sicily, second husband Raymond VII of Toulouse

John 1166-1216 King of England, married Hawise daughter of William, Earl of Gloucester (marriage annulled), married Isabella of Angoulême

Other Historical Figures:

Geoffrey (the Bastard) 1152-1212 Henry's illegitimate son, before marriage to Eleanor, became Archbishop of York, mother possibly Ykenai

Otto Duke of Brunswick, Eleanor's grandson (son of Matilda and Henry of Saxony), became Holy Roman Emperor, considered once to become Duke of Aquitaine

Eleanor's 1st husband King Louis VII of France, their daughters Marie and Alix

Thomas Becket, became Archbishop of Canterbury, succeeded by Archbishop Baldwin

Saldebreuil de Sanzay, Constable of Aquitaine

English Chancellor Geoffrey Ridel

Hugh de Saint-Maure, a powerful Poitvin noble

Princess Alais of France, Louis VII's second daughter to second wife Constance, sister Margaret, wife of Young King of England, Hal (Henry III)

King Phillip Augustus, Louis VII's son to third wife Adela

Count Raymond V of Toulouse

Chapter 1 The Young King

Papa's old library was my sanctuary. I slumped into the chair at my desk and turned the pages of my journal. So much had happened.

Henry had arrived at the Palace of L'Ombrière to collect Hal. The time had come for him to be crowned the Young King of England in Westminster Abbey, but he balked at the prospect.

'Darling, your crowning is a great honour. It is your father's tradition. Not only that, it is your duty.'

'I do not care! I do not want the damn title, two meaningless words. And I am not going back to England, so there!' He stomped to the door.

I raised my voice. 'I am sorry, Hal, but you must obey. As I have said, you are duty-bound. Furthermore, this is your destiny. It is ordained...'

'No!' The door slammed.

But I was certain it was his suspicions regarding the state of Henry's and my marriage that was behind his reluctance. His father and I were estranged. I had walked out, bolted to the Aquitaine after discovering his affair with Rosamund Clifford, which was at its height when John was born. Amidst the hurt and humiliation, though, I think I still loved Henry, desired him...but?

When Henry arrived, he begged my forgiveness. He kissed me and tried to unlace my gown, but the braided cords knotted in his haste. Frustrated, he tried to rip the sumptuous robe from my body. We ended in a tangled heap on my bed fully clothed, boots and all. Henry tore at his braies with one hand, with the other, he tried to hoist the twisted silk above my knees. My passion for him almost over-ruled common sense. But, at the last moment, I could not bring myself to lie with a husband I no longer trusted. I struggled from his groping and pushed him away.

Hell was about to break loose between us when Jerome banged on my chamber door.

‘Lord Henry! Lord Henry!’ His voice was insistent. ‘A courier has just delivered a missive for you, Milord. He said it is most urgent and must be placed in your hands immediately.’

Henry stormed to the door, wrenched it open and snatched the letter from my dear childhood companion, now a Benedictine monk. I dashed towards my dressing room, but an animal howl halted me. The letter was from Henry’s brother William. Their mother, Empress Matilda, had died.

Within days, the family sailed to Barfleur and galloped to Rouen. Matilda had been interred in her beloved Abbey of Bec by the time we arrived. We attended memorial services and prayers for her immortal soul in Rouen Cathedral.

Henry readied himself to sail to England after the ceremonies were over. But Hal was still stubbornly protesting.

‘I am not going! I do not want to be crowned.’

I tried to calm him. ‘Hal, please, listen. I have told you; you have no choice. You are your father’s heir—by the Grace of God, the Young King of England.’

Hal was about to bolt. I barred the door.

‘Hal, please...please...do it for me.’

We stood eyeball to eyeball.

‘I am not going without you, Maman. I do not care what you say!’

I took Hal’s face in my hands. ‘I promise I will accompany you. I want to, and it is my duty.’ I kissed his forehead and left to inform Henry of my decision.

I steadied myself and entered Henry’s chamber.

‘Henry, I am sorry to interrupt, but I must speak to you.’ Icicles hung in the air. ‘I will be returning to England with you to attend Hal’s crowning as the Young King.’

‘And so you should, Eleanor. It is your duty, as my queen as well as to Hal.’

‘I am aware of my duties to Hal, Henry.’

His tone of voice had me gritting my teeth, so I turned to leave, muttering, ‘It is a pity you do not.’

‘So that is it, Eleanor?’ Henry shouted after me, ‘Why not just send a courier?’

We arrived in London. Preparations for the crowning were finalised. Richard, Geoffrey and the three girls were excited as was our youngest son John, who was with us from Fontevrault Abbey.

The ceremony proclaiming Hal as the Young King was deeply spiritual. The pride I had in my beloved son was immeasurable when the crown was placed on his head.

But Thomas Becket's bitterness hovered. Henry had forbidden him from crowning Hal, although it was his right as Archbishop of Canterbury. Instead, Archbishop Roger of York officiated. Becket was out for vengeance. He had refused to obey the Common Laws of England like his predecessor, and his defiance led to a schism between him and his king. Becket insisted unordained clerks who committed crimes while employed by the church should be judged by Canon Law, rather than within England's legal system. Thomas Becket then exiled himself in Paris and endeared himself to no-one other than like-minded clerics.

We returned to the Palace at Westminster after the ceremony for a sumptuous banquet in the Great Hall, now as bare as a monastery refectory. After I discovered Henry's affair, I stripped our royal residences of all adornment that came from my dowry. I started at Woodstock and worked my way through Windsor, Westminster and Winchester, our major royal residences. Henry was lucky to be left with a bed to sleep in, let alone a feather mattress.

As far as I was concerned, Henry deserved the austerity with no rich décor to impress his barons or another woman. Luckily, the weather was balmy or the elaborate tapestries that had kept out the draughts would be missed. I wondered what excuses Henry used to explain their disappearance. Sir Robert whispered he was having a war against extravagance.

After the celebrations were over, the rest of the children and I prepared to return to the Aquitaine. Hal had to remain with his father. He was miserable. I took him to the library, the only place I had not torn asunder, and sat him down.

He begged. 'Maman, please, please stay. It is going to be hell without you.'

'Do not despair, darling...'

'But, Maman, what will I do? Papa barely talks to me. I will be twiddling my thumbs.'

'I will speak to your father, make him realise he must give you duties to train you for your regal responsibilities.'

'That will be the day. You are the one who teaches us; Papa just yells.'

'I will do my best to make him understand.'

Hal thumped his fist on my desk.

'Why will you not tell me what is really going on between you and Papa?'

'It is better we live apart to give us time to heal our differences,' I muttered.

I knew it was a lame excuse. Hal was on the cusp of manhood. I had no idea what he knew about laying with a woman. It was something I could not discuss as his mother, nor could I reveal the gruesome facts as to why I could not stay in England as Henry's wife. I believed Hal was still too young to understand the causes of his parent's marital problems.

I had discovered other infidelities on Henry's part while in London. These were women of noble birth, not just a couple of milkmaids or tavern strumpets, but women who no doubt were attracted to the king by his title. Some had borne him children.

I confronted him. 'What is your explanation, Henry?'

'It is a pack of lies by those who want to discredit me and come between us. Was it Owain Pendragon, or Brynn, that Welsh witch?'

I ignored his insinuations and handed him a list.

'Anyone could have written that!'

'The proof comes from a convent where at least one of your bastard daughters is housed.'

He went pale, but I remained calm. 'I will be leaving within the week for Bordeaux with the rest of the children. It is also time you fulfilled your promise to Geoffrey by bestowing on him the title of Duke of Brittany. Try to get on with Hal, and for God's sake, Henry, give him duties! Teach him about the governance and laws of his kingdom. I have started the process. It is time for you to continue it. Now I must prepare for my departure.'

Henry put his hand on my arm.

'Take your hand off me,' I demanded.

When he did not, I slapped it away and walked with as much dignity as I could.

'We have a political alliance, Eleanor. You are still my queen.'

With my hand on the doorknob, I paused.

'Mop up your own mess, 'enri Plantagenet-a. I brokered peace then you destroy it. As I was trained by my father, I will govern the Aquitaine. I will work to repair the damage you caused in my County of Poitou by sending your mercenaries to pillage the land and rape innocent villagers. I will endeavour to regain the trust of my vassals by applying the laws of my duchy, not the Anglo-Norman tyranny you live by. Now I will take my leave.'

The day before my departure, Hal again begged me not to leave him with his father. I hugged him and reminded him I would see him in Normandy when he was to marry Princess Margaret of France. Hal ranted and raved, sounding horribly like Henry.

'It is bad enough that I must wear a hollow crown. Now I must marry a baby.'

Hal's indignation made me laugh. 'Darling, Princess Margaret is about your age.'

'Really?' Hal then smiled. 'Yes, I suppose she would have grown. What does Margaret look like? She could be ugly?'

'I have never seen her. King Louis prevented that. But Louis was good looking when I knew him. Margaret's mother, the late Queen Constance, was said to be attractive, dark-haired, Spanish looking.'

'What if Margaret is narrow-minded like King Louis?'

'That I cannot answer, but as she has not been reared in the French court, she may have had a wider upbringing.'

‘Will I have to go to bed with her?’ Hal blushed.

‘Ah... well now... that is something you will have to ask your father or Sir Robert. But I am sure if she is attractive, that is... um... something you will want to do.’

Hal shuffled his feet as I cleared my throat.

‘Darling, try to get along with your father. We are duty-bound to follow the destinies that God and our births have placed on us. We cannot do otherwise.’

‘I am never going to forgive Papa. I know he has done something bad to you and I do not want to stay in England. My life is going to be wretched.’

‘Darling, you are not entirely alone. You have Millicent and Agnes with you, and all the members of your court from the day you were born. Sir Robert will always be a mentor, too, and friend if you need advice.’ I had to keep a brave face.

Dear God, I prayed, please help Henry to be a father to his son and heir.

It was a wrenching goodbye. Henry came to Queenhithe Dock on the Thames but stood aloof. I did not acknowledge him. We had nothing more to say to each other. Robert escorted me and the other children onto the barque. They, too, were sad saying good-bye to their brother. I begged Robert to look after Hal, to keep me informed of his progress, and to try to get father and son to respect each other if nothing else.

You've Just Finished your Free Sample

Enjoyed the preview?

Buy: <http://www.ebooks2go.com>