CHAPTER 1—THE FALL OF HUMAN CIVILIZATION

The year was 2222. Human civilization had reached the height of its technological achievement, yet it had also reached the beginning of its downfall. Giant cities stretched toward the sky, artificial intelligence connected the world, and humanity had gained control over almost every corner of Earth. But beneath that progress, greed, war, economic crises, inequality, and the exploitation of nature were slowly destroying the foundations of civilization. Forests disappeared, oceans became polluted, fertile soil deteriorated, and climate change transformed entire regions into places increasingly difficult to inhabit. Nations fought over dwindling resources. When a new disease began spreading across the world, civilization started to collapse. Hospitals became overwhelmed, governments lost control, and millions fled cities that were gradually becoming silent.

Then the final catastrophe came from the sky. One night, a massive meteor entered Earth's atmosphere and struck the planet. From fragments of the extraterrestrial object came an unknown organism carrying a virus unlike anything humanity had ever encountered. Within weeks, those infected were transformed into savage creatures stripped of their human consciousness. Cities descended into chaos. The last armies failed to stop the spread. Power grids went dark one after another, satellites stopped functioning, and global communication was severed. In the end, humanity was not defeated by a single war or a single disease, but by the accumulation of its own mistakes—and something that had arrived from beyond its world. Human civilization came to an end.

CHAPTER 2 THE ROBOT AWAKENS

The year was 2333. One hundred and eleven years had passed since the final night of human civilization. Deep beneath the ruins of an abandoned military base, a steel chamber still stood in darkness. Inside it rested a green-colored robot, asleep within a maintenance capsule. Most of its memory had been damaged. It did not know who it was, where it had come from, or why it had been placed there. For more than a century, its systems had waited in silence. Then, without warning, an emergency power source activated. A small light appeared in its eyes. Its metal body slowly moved, as if discovering the world for the first time.

The robot opened the base doors and walked toward the surface. For the first time in 111 years, sunlight touched its body. It stopped. The world described in its memories had disappeared. Buildings had collapsed beneath roots, abandoned vehicles were covered with moss, and highways had become wild forests. Among the ruins lay thousands of bones and human remains. Yet the world was not completely silent. From the distance came footsteps and long, terrible groans. Pale figures moved between the ruined buildings. The robot watched them without understanding what it was seeing. Then a single word emerged from its remaining memory:

ZOMBIE....
